

As a college freshman, I cajoled and nagged my dad for an inexpensive secondhand car. He assured me that there was no such thing: the extra unforeseen costs would make car ownership prohibitive. I didn't believe it, and kept on arguing until he finally stopped me by asking how old I was.

"Nineteen," I replied.

"Drew," he said, "if I'd had a car when I was your age, you would be 23 today."
